4. Read the following passage carefully and answer all the questions which follow.

Modern life has become easier in many ways unlike the past. We can relay messages across the world, order food from our homes and find information within seconds. Yet, convenience can change our expectations. When it disappears, even briefly, we may feel that we have been unfairly treated.

This was evident when a community introduced an online system for paying bills and reporting problems. At first, residents were delighted because they no longer had to spend hours at the municipal office. Before long, they started complaining about the smallest delays. They had become too used to having things the easier way.

The problem was not the technology itself. It was the impatience that grew with it. People who rarely had to wait began to see waiting as a punishment. They wanted everything at their fingertips, forgetting that some things cannot be hurried. Convenience was supposed to make life easier but it was beginning to get on people's nerves whenever it failed to work perfectly.

Perhaps the real test of convenience is what happens when it fails us. A power cut should not make us helpless, nor should a slow internet connection dampen our spirits. Useful inventions should serve us, but they should not determine how much patience we have. If we expect every aspect of life to be quick, ordinary difficulties may seem like major problems.
